From 1776 to the 1850s, Native people of Central California experienced consecutive waves of missionary, mercantile, and settler colonialism. While colonial programs uprooted many Coast Miwok communities of the Marin Peninsula, others sought refuge across the landscape and mobilize traditional practices. Archaeological research addressing native resistance and resiliency are examined, including recent findings from my field project at Tomales Bay.